Abstract: Through online questionnaire and in-depth telephone interviews on the current situations of collection asset management in “Double First-Class” university libraries, it is concluded that blurred asset boundaries, non-standardized asset measurement and pricing methods, ineffective asset inventory, lack of unified guidance on asset disposal, inadequacy of asset liquidity, disconnection between asset management system and library operation system, along with inadequacy of workflow specification and system construction are the major problems in collection asset management at present. In order to improve the efficiency of asset management and better perform the functions of academic resource supporting system for talent development and scientific research in universities, it is proposed for libraries to put more emphasis on more asset management human resource, sound asset management system, clear asset management scope, enact asset disposal measures, perfect supervision mechanisms, and improvement of the standardization and systematicity of asset management. Meanwhile, it is also recommended for the libraries to increase investment in the software and hardware of collection asset management, advance the application of artificial intelligence technology such as autonomous inventory robots, break system barriers, explore data exchange, and enable data fusions between collection management system and asset management platform.
